Some people live forever. Some die a thousand times. And others never live at all. I awoke to a pig-snout in my face, the smell of slop assaulting my nose. With a start, I rolled off my straw pile and hit my knees against the hard wooden floor of the barn. The pig laughed at me as he rubbed his snout against my tattered dress. "Shut your snout, Wil," I said, rubbing my knees as I picked myself off the floor. Wil just shook his head, oinking even louder as he pranced away toward the other eleven pigs. The barn wasn't very big. It had barely enough room for the thirteen of us, but it was the coziest place I'd ever slept. A quick glance around told me the sun was just waking, wisps of sunlight beginning to appear through the slats. I shivered as I checked the health of each pig, my bare feet slapping against the puddles left by the rain the night before. I pointedly ignored my distorted reflection in the water. I didn't need any reminders. I saved Wil for last, checking his hoofs and snout with care. He was easy to pick out because he had a brown spot around his left eye and he was bigger than the other pigs. That also meant he'd be the first to go. It was only a matter of time. Confident everyone was healthy, I allowed myself to return to my pile of straw. It would be a little while longer before the rest of the farm would awake, giving me enough time to work on my gift. With great care, I took the gift from beside my bed and placed it on my lap, examining it before continuing my work. It was a necklace made of straw, my most intricate design to date. It had already come apart several times, but it seemed the gift was finally coming together. A storm of emotions whirled within me as I pulled back my curly hair, tying it in a knot to keep it from interfering with my work. Then I went about examining my bed, looking for just the right piece of straw to add to the necklace. That was when I heard the shouts from outside, coming closer by the second. Kendrick. I immediately started sweating, fighting the dread threatening to overtake me. There were plenty of reasons he could be coming to the barn. Though only one of them would bring him out this early Suddenly, Kendrick kicked in the fragile barn door, a satisfied smile on his face. "Morning, Allie!" Kendrick said, his eyes disturbingly wild as he licked his lips. He was the eeriest twelve-year-old I'd ever met. "Good morning, Master Kendrick," I replied, bowing as I carefully placed the necklace in the pocket of my dress. Kendrick eyed me, looking me up and down before finally nodding. "Guess what? I made my voice as light as possible. "What?" "I said to guess," Kendrick frowned, "don't you listen?" I nodded, counting to three before answering. "My apologies, Master Kendrick. Is it Market already?" He smiled wickedly, "no guess again." Just then I heard the sound of wheels squeaking outside the barn, confirming my fear. Fighting a whimper, I gave in. "It's Feeding day." Kendrick nodded vigorously, skipping over to the pigs in delight. "Do you wanna choose which one?" My hands began to tremble. "You know your father will choose." Kendrick frowned at me again, but said nothing as my owner appeared in the doorway. He was a tall man, muscular and disapproving. "Dad, can you make Allie choose the pig this time?" Kendrick asked, imitating his father as he straightened his posture. "Good morning, Master Smith," I said, bowing once again. "Lower," Smith growled, his eyes cutting me. He was dressed in his finest clothes, sporting both a hat and cane, just as he always did for Feeding day. I bowed again as low as I could manage, holding the position as blood rushed to my head. I waited a full five seconds before straightening back up, inwardly seething.

Immortal

I'm something like sixty-thousand years old, and I've probably thought more about my own death than any living being has thought about any subject, ever. I used to be unduly preoccupied with what might constitute a "good death", although interestingly, this has always been an after-the-fact analysis. What I mean is, following a near-death experience, I'll generally perform a quiet review of the circumstances and judge whether that death would have been objectively good, by whatever metric one uses for that kind of thing. I'm not nearly that self-reflective while in the midst of said near-death experience. Facing death, the predominant thought is always not like this. A disease threatening the lives of everyone—human and non-human—has been loosed upon the world, by an arch-enemy Adam didn't even know he had. That's just the first of his problems. Adam's also in jail, facing multiple counts of murder, at least a few of which are accurate. He may never see the inside of a courtroom, because there remains a bounty on his head—put there by the aforementioned arch-enemy—that someone is bound to try to collect while he's stuck behind bars. Meanwhile, Adam's sitting on some tantalizing evidence that there might be a cure, but to find it, he's going to have to get out of jail, get out of the country, and track down the man responsible. He can't do any of that alone, but he also can't rely on any of his non-human friends for help, not when they're all getting sick. What he needs is a particularly gifted human, who can do things no other human is capable of. He knows one such person. He calls himself a fixer, and he's Adam's—and possibly the world's—last hope. That's provided he believes any of it. Immortal: Last Call is the sixth book in the Immortal Novel Series, and also the end of a long journey for one immortal man.

Although her reputation is founded primarily on her California fiction and essays, as well her biography of Alexander Hamilton, Atherton also produced a number of Gothic stories, some of them, such as The Bell in the Fog, were considered significant achievements in the Gothic/supernaturalist tradition. The story begins: Axiochus of Miletus was dead and in the dark hour before dawn the doors of his house were thrown open, the flute boy gave signal, the professional dirge-singers raised their voices in lamentation and issued into the street beating their breasts.
