In 1845, a fungus had destroyed almost half the potato crop in Ireland. In 1846, near the end of July, almost two million acres of the dark green leaves and purple blossoms were attacked again, producing an intolerable, sulfurous, sewer-like stench. Brown spots covered the leaves, and canker sores the stalks.

Paddy's Lament: Ireland, 1846-1847: Prelude to Hatred by

This eloquent, searing, and haunting account of the great famine will shock and move the reader, evoke compassion and fury, and add substance to Ireland's bitter, undying hatred for England. Ireland was, and is, too close to England. Queen Elizabeth, in the 16th century, sent military expeditions to subdue the dissident Catholic, fiercely independent clans across the Irish Sea.
